

A male carries a Y gene from his Father and a X from his Mother.

When a male matches another male on the X chromosome it's through each of their mother's line.

When a male matches a female it's still on his mother side. The female who matches him does so through either her mother's or father's female lines in her tree. (See chart No. 3 for female lines location in tree.)